Campus officials reinforce dress code rules

Sheer pants, head coverings, vulgar clothing not allowed at Lindenwood

By Dan Sonderman
Senior Writer

There's an old saying, it's the clothes that make the person. That's partially true. Last month, Lindenwood University officials sent an e-mail to students reminding them of the dress code on campus.

John Oldani, vice president for student development, said there wasn't a specific incident that triggered the e-mail, it was just a reminder.

"Lindenwood students always impress me," Oldani said. "They are very polite and respectful, I'm very impressed and I've been around a while."

Oldani went on to say the dress code is a guideline for students to use.

He added that mostly students just need a reminder, but if there was a problem, they would deal with it with the student.

"We would treat the individual student," Oldani said, "not punish the masses."

Kerry Cox, director of student activities, said the dress code is nothing new; it's been in the rule book for a long time.

"There were some people wearing things they shouldn't have," Cox said. "The biggest concern was sheer pants."

One point of confusion on the e-mail was the description of "lounge wear." Oldani said it meant inappropriate clothing.

"Does that mean you can't wear jeans? Absolutely not," Oldani said.

Most students see nothing wrong with the university's dress code.

"It's really just common sense," said Lauren Maag, a psychology major.

Lauren Grotegeers, a sophomore majoring in non-profit administration, said the dress code was nothing she hasn't heard before.

"In one of my classes we saw a power point slide on it (the dress code)," Grotegeers said.

Professor will lead lecture to address writer's strike

[The strike] 'signals the biggest, most profound change in television.'

By Chelsea Lewis
Chief Copy Editor

Professor Rift Fournier and film writer Paul Guyot will share their thoughts on the 2007-2008 Writers Guild of America (WGA) strike today, Feb. 20, from 7-8:30 p.m. in the Young Hall Auditorium. The lecture is free and anyone is invited to attend.

Fournier, a veteran of the television writing industry, will share personal experiences dealing with the WGA and explain how he believes the Internet will play a very large role for writers in upcoming years.

Lindenwood junior Wes Murrell, a multimedia design major, was hoping to get an internship in TV writing.

As of Nov. 5, 2007, the beginning of the WGA strike, that was made nearly impossible.

The strike, which lasted for a little more than 14 weeks, stalled the production of numerous television programs.

At first, Murrell didn't feel negatively affected by the strike. "I was happy to hear it was going on because I think that Hollywood writers are worth more than they're credited for," Murrell said. "The thought that this would make already hard-to-find internships in the field even sparser was a surprise. It seemed like an opportunity to start in that field, when, in fact, it's actually more of a roadblock," said Murrell.

Though times after the strike seem rough now, Fournier sees more opportunities for students in the years following.

"The Writer's Guild strike, which I'm going to talk about Wednesday night, signals the biggest, most profound change in television," said Fournier. "The good news for our writing students is, thanks to the Web, young writers will have more opportunities."

Fournier also stresses the importance of the strike, not just for writers' financial reasons, but also for personal reasons within the guild. Unlike the guild's largest strike in 1988, this time the writers had a common mind. "The biggest victory for the writers in this strike was their unity," he said.

Safe options for students

During housing sign-ups in March, students will be given the option of purchasing a safe for their room. The safes are $95 a year. College Safes Inc. will install the new safety devices over the summer in time for fall semester. The safes will be large enough to hold a laptop, jewelry, Ipods and other valuables. For more information contact Terry Russell at 636-949-4980.

Boone Home offers glimpse into state's frontier past

Located in Defiance, Mo., a mere 30 minutes from Lindenwood's main campus, is the chance to experience and gain new appreciation of 19th century frontier life.

"Folks have that image of the American frontier as being Daniel Boone," said Grady Manus, Boone Campus chief of interpretation.

The Old Peace Chapel is one of the many historic buildings in the Boonesfield Village. Since its construction in the mid 1800s, the structure has been used not only as a church but as a meeting hall and a merchant's store.

That's why he and other members of the Boone Campus staff have dedicated so much time to make the location as authentic as possible.

The university acquired the Boone home and surrounding land in 1998 from Randall and Alean Andrae, private landowners who donated the property. Over the past 10 years, the 261-acre site has grown to more than 1,000 acres.

The campus is more than just a tourist attraction, officials say; it's a learning environment.

As Lindenwood's National Center for the Study of American Culture and Values, the Boone Campus gives students a more hands-on, non-traditional approach to education.

The staff is always trying to expand what the site offers to students. Plans are under way for interpretive experiences on the Spanish era and Native American history.

Boone staff members also hope to discover the original location of the slave quarters and learn more about

Signs of change dominate student government meeting

By Dan Sonderman
Senior Writer

After discussions during the Lindenwood Student Government Association meeting Feb. 12, changes can be expected on campus. More signage, a different method of plowing snow, additional lighting, more walkways and possibly the addition of bike trails are on Lindenwood's to-do list.

According to Wade Hampton, director of residential services, the university wants to place a stop sign in the high pedestrian area between Sibley Hall and Ayers Hall.

"We don't have a lot of problems" with vehicles, Hampton said. "We need to make sure kids can walk; this should be a walking campus."

Plans are also under way to add additional stop signs, street signs and pedestrian walkway signs around campus.

Hampton noted plans to add more lighting on walkways, in addition to the lights added last year. "From last year to this year you'll see there's a considerable amount of difference" in lighting, Hampton said.

Lindenwood will look at alternative methods of plowing snow so that student's cars are not snowed in, Hampton said. He said shovels should be available in every dorm.

Sophomore Anyia Kennedy said she had to call off going to work because the plows had pushed too much snow behind her car.

Hampton also touched on the university's parking situation. He said LU's parking is great compared with other universities' parking systems. LU officials are also looking into zoned parking. "There's plenty of parking on campus, it's just not where you want it," he said. "When I was in college, I parked my car on Sunday and walked the whole week; I was poor."

The Connection in Spellmann Center might also get an upgrade in the near future.

"We want to make The Connection a place where students want to be," said Kerry Cox, director of student activities.

Cox cited plans for four new vending machines, new couches and chairs, and foosball, air hockey and pool tables.

Cox also asked students to help make sure the new equipment lasts a while.

"These are nice tables, so if you see [anyone] jumping on them, tell them to knock it off," Cox said.

Lindenwood Professor Michael Castro reads works of Attila Jozsef as Hungarian poet Gabor Gyukics listens.

Hungarian poetry finds local audience

By Jordan Lanham
Staff Writer

Students and faculty attended a reading and discussion of the poetry of one of Hungary's best known 20th century poets, Attila Jozsef, on Tuesday, Feb. 5, in Sibley Chapel.

Lindenwood's Masters of Fine Arts Program for creative writing and the English Department sponsored the event.

Lindenwood Professor Michael Castro and Hungarian poet Gabor G. Gyukics, translators, led the event.

"You're here to hear something about Hungarian poetry?" Gyukics asked. "Where are your friends?" he joked with the crowd of 30 before the reading began.

Castro and Gyukics, both published poets, spent four years translating the work of Jozsef in their book, "A Transparent Lion: Selected Poetry of Attila Jozsef." Gyukics is on a national poetry reading tour that includes 24 readings in cities throughout the United States.

Castro will join him for four of those readings.

Jozsef's poems have been translated into more than 50 languages and expressed through music, dance and art.

He is one of the most celebrated poets in Hungary although not well known in the United States.

This, according to Castro and Gyukics, was the reason for their project.

"You can't point out one Hungarian from [age] 6 up who won't know his poems," Gyukics said.

Gyukics began the reading with one of Jozsef's poems in Hungarian, and then Castro read the English translation.

Castro briefed the audience on Jozsef's unstable, poverty stricken youth and how it was these factors that contributed to his darkly themed poetry.

"He struggled with religion; he struggled with love; he struggled with making a living," Castro said.

Copies of the book were available at the reading. Student Jennifer Appal, who bought a copy just before the reading began, said she thinks Jozsef "wrote very sad, dark poems based on such a struggle in childhood."

Appal is an MFA student and an aspiring poet herself. "I like to support poets," she said. "I hope someday someone would buy my $12 book at a reading."

After the reading, Castro and Gyukics answered questions from the audience about Jozsef and the difficulty of translating.

Castro said it can be "hard to keep the essence of the poet's spirit," but he and Gyukics tried to stay true to Jozsef's meaning.

"We gave ourselves to it as poets," said Gyukics. "If you're not a poet, you can't translate."

Castro said that he was never sure that he got the English translations right until he shared the poems with others, and that seeing their reactions is "emotionally powerful."

Linden trees take a beating this winter

Chris Dillon
Contributing writer

Kyle Routh, the grounds director for Lindenwood University, is looking out for the school's namesake — the linden trees.

"If you see a rope and a guy up in a tree, that's probably me," Routh said. His job is to check tree limbs and cut off broken ones.

He also checks for rot and if necessary, removes trees.

A dry summer along with winter storms has caused some of the lindens to lose their canopies, according to Routh.

The trees can repair themselves, but some older trees have to be replaced.

The grounds department planted 35 trees on campus last December and 11 were lindens.

Two varieties of lindens can be found on campus: Basswood (Tilia americana) and Littleleaf (Tilia cordata).

Routh said that the obvious difference is the size of their leaves, and that the Littleleaf lindens do not last much more than 50 years because of their weak root structure.

Routh said that campus linden trees are "inconspicuous," and a lot of trees people think are lindens really aren't.

For instance, the trees running the length of the main driveway in the historic part of campus are oaks, not lindens.

Though they didn't help name our school, the Osage orange trees in front of Young Hall are particular favorites of Routh's.

He said they're some of the oldest and largest Osage orange trees in the St. Louis area.

Routh doesn't believe any lindens on campus were alive when the university was founded in 1827, but he estimates the oldest lindens to have been on campus for about a century.

Currently, about 50 different varieties of trees inhabit Lindenwood.

Burnette's travels around the world put him in tune with international students

By Cindy Muehlbacher
Contributing Writer

Have you ever heard of a place called Diego Garcia? Most people probably haven't, but Chris Burnette, 34, the director of the International Student Center, has been to this small British atoll located in the Indian Ocean.

The passionate traveler has been all over the world, qualifying him for a job that requires dealing with students from at least a dozen different countries on a daily basis.

Last March, Burnette received his master's degree in non-profit administration from Lindenwood University. Prior to that, he finished his studies at Northern Arizona University with a bachelor's in American political studies and a focus on environmental law and policy. Currently he is taking classes at St. Louis University Law School to get his master's in political science.

Burnette didn't start out working for the International Student Center. When he arrived at Lindenwood, he worked in the Admissions Office. Former President Dennis Spellmann and Ryan Guffey, the current assistant vice president for Student Development and Special Projects, asked him to work for the international office.

"Dr. Spellmann requested me because he liked my background," Burnette said. "I've traveled all over the world."

Burnette's travels have included trips to Japan, South Korea, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco, Germany, England and Italy.

"My favorite place was Scotland, because that is where my family is originally from and if there is one place I could choose to go, it would be Scotland," he said.

Places he would like to visit include Georgia and the capital of Azerbaijan, Baku. "The Eastern Orthodox tradition with all its icons and religious symbols just fascinates me, so I would definitely love to visit these places," said Burnette.

"My interest in going to Baku was raised by my colleague Emin Hajiyev, who comes from Azerbaijan." Hajiyev also works in the International Student Center.

Burnette enjoys his job because he likes the everyday challenges of working with different types of people. "In this position, you always find yourself in new situations and you have to find a way to deal with that — and that is what I love about this job," said Burnette.

In his free time, Burnette likes to read, go to national parks and follow politics. "This time is especially exciting for me since the presidential elections are coming up," he said.

When he is done with law school, Burnette plans to teach American politics and environmental policy.

Chris Burnette's background in traveling was key for his success as the director of the International Student Center. Legacy photo by Jeremy Hicks

Intercultural Club president aims for change

By Maxi Weiner
Contributing Writer

Students joining an organization collect points for their resume while having fun. One of those students is Giang Ha Tran, the new president of the Intercultural Club at Lindenwood University.

"I'm really honored," said Tran, 20. "It's a great opportunity to practice leadership."

Tran started her undergraduate program in international business and international relations in fall 2006 at Lindenwood. Since then, she has been vice president of the Intercultural Club.

"Lindenwood has many international students," said Tran. "The club was the perfect organization to provide background information and local experience for arriving students."

Tran said breaking down stereotypes and forming a bridge between the St. Charles community and international students is the aim for the club.

Tran wanted to experience a different country after graduating from high school in Germany.

"I don't regret moving to the states two years ago," said Tran. "I wanted to find out if I can be independent and succeed in life."

She did succeed and proved her multitasking talent with the organization of the International Day last fall. Almost 700 people attended the event.

At the International Day, Lindenwood students tasted international food and experienced a variety of great performances, said Tran. This semester, the event will be held on April 11.

The Intercultural Club is a student organization that promotes cultural diversity, understanding and tolerance.

They meet every Thursday in Spellmann Center 4095 from 5 to 6 p.m. to plan the International Day, other intercultural events and topics of a speaker series.

Fatemeh Keshavarz, professor of Persian language and literature and chair of the Department of Asian and Near Eastern Languages and Literatures in Arts and Sciences at Washington University, is the first speaker the Intercultural Club will feature.

Keshavarz will be at Lindenwood on March 13 and will lecture on women in Islam. Another club-hosted event, Intercultural Trivia Night, is planned for March 14.

For more information about intercultural events, stop by a club meeting or contact Hiroko Furuhashi, Intercultural Club vice president, at hf535@lionmail.lindenwood.edu.

Health 235: New definition of life, death and coping

Death. It surrounds us every day. Do we ever give it much thought?

We grieved when we heard of the senseless violence in Kirkwood. We wept when we heard of the unexpected death of Heath Ledger. We stopped in horror when we heard of Virginia Tech.

Just last week it hit us again at Northern Illinois University. We wondered why this had to happen. And then we moved on.

As human beings we are designed to cope with unfathomable pain. But what does it mean to cope? According to Merriam-Webster, "cope" means to deal with and attempt to overcome problems and difficulties.

The word can also mean to maintain a contest. More archaic forms of the word mean to fight. But what does all this stand for when you're dealing with death?

During J-term, I received a call from my dad before my class was about start. He told me that my 15-year-old puppy, Sarah, was dying. Her back legs had finally given out and she wasn't eating. My mother was going to take her to the vet to have her put down.

As I hung up, I tried to push all of this from my mind. I wiped the tears off my cheek as I went to class. I told myself, "She's just a dog, so stop crying." But I didn't believe that. She had always been more than just a dog. I had Sarah since I was 5 years old. We grew up together.

I left class early to drive home. I won't try to convey how hard it was to watch my dog die or to bury her afterwards. When I think of her, I want to break down and cry. Instead I cope.

For me that means I fight sadness and pain, and overcome it by focusing on the good memories of her.

I remember how my uncle nicknamed her Fatso when she was born.

I think about when she got so scared of fireworks on the Fourth of July that she ripped a hole in the screen door trying to get away from the sound.

Life is about finding the beautiful, the overwhelming, the perfect moments and holding on to them. The best thing we can do to honor someone's (or something's) life is to remember what was beautiful about that life. We think of the good and laugh again.

In doing what has to be done, it almost seems heartless. Yet I think that most people agree, regardless of religious beliefs, that those we love never truly leave us. They live on in our memories. So why mourn forever when they're not really gone?

Life will always have its heartaches. But then again, without darkness how would we know there was such a thing as light?

M.E. Brown

The political beat goes on

As most students will conclude through media saturation and continuous chatter from political-junkie friends, the race for the White House has been enduring for some time. This could be to the chagrin of some: the ones who are simply apathetic, or suffered the crippling blow of their candidate dropping out of the race.

Some are elated, rolling around in all this political exhilaration like a dog in the grass. Either way, most are aware of what's going on. We see names and statistics and know something new is creeping over the horizon.

Being somewhat of a political beast who thrives off the debates, primaries, political commentary and stories, I can't help but become annoyed or appalled at certain occurrences during this time of the fight for top bunk. The debates are utter comedy, McCain simply muttering things about letting "more sun shine" on financial markets and the broken-record name dropping of his cohorts in times of economic confusion.

This is the same guy who also suggests we could stay in Iraq for 100 years and has been Bush's biggest cheerleader in every ball game where the president has fumbled. I guess to Mr. Bush, it's not about succeeding but having fun playing the game.

Most likely none of this will matter to a lot of Republican voters because McCain took first in the Florida primary and continues to grab states. The only problem is that he is having trouble gaining the support of true conservatives. Now that Mitt Romney has dropped out, Romney's supporters don't have any other place to go. I'll bet a few would rather vote Democrat than go the way of McCain.

Nonetheless, it seems a vast majority vote on who's cool at the time – everyone seems to follow some empty fad that wears out after the new one sets in. But this is the peril of having a few good men in a country whose voting majority seemingly listens to mediocrity instead of the candidates with fresh ideas.

Mainstream media keeps us from hearing anyone's voice that isn't constantly caught in the barrage of attention, so we're stuck with George W. Bush twice because the people don't get to listen to all the candidates fairly.

Why else would John McCain and Hillary Clinton have so much rabid support? If it boils down to those two in the end and Ron Paul or Barack Obama are gone, I'm writing in one of the latter's names on the ballot.

We're in for a tumultuous journey from here until November. Many Americans will become angry or be let down, some will revel in the sheer triumph of their candidate winning four primaries in a row, and some will stay up late debating issues over a couple brews.

Most important, people will learn about the perplexity of American politics and become immersed in it.

Super Tuesday whittles it down

Four candidates left, next three weeks crucial for November ballot

In the past two weeks a lot has happened within the unfolding political race.

Before Super Tuesday, Feb. 5, Democratic presidential hopeful and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards – and Sen. John Kerry's 2004 vice presidential candidate – officially dropped out of the running. After placing third in nearly every primary he entered, his camp made the decision to back down and allow the two front-runners to duke it out.

The Republican Party also lost one of its three candidates when Gov. Mitt Romney threw in the towel. The once believed front-runner Romney had fallen in polls across the country and on Feb. 6 announced that he was leaving the race to focus on other things. Some analysts believe he is trying to find a spot as Arizona Sen. John McCain's running mate, or perhaps awaiting another shot in 2012.

Although he has fewer delegates overall than Romney, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is still fighting. "We're continuing to work and to give voters in these states a choice," said Huckabee in his speech after Super Tuesday.

He also spoke about how many experts feel that Mc-Cain is too liberal for the Republicans. Despite his numerous appearances on both "Late Night with Conan O'Brien" and "The Colbert Report," Huckabee is still a far second to McCain, who along with Sen. Barack Obama swept the Feb. 12 primaries in Washington, D.C., Maryland and Virginia.

The Feb. 12 primaries provided a great boost for McCain as the front-runner for the GOP, and pushed Obama to a slight lead over New York Sen. Hillary Clinton. Though Obama leads by less than 100 delegates, these were big wins in his camp.

Obama took more than 60 percent of the female votes, which up until recently had been the backbone of Clinton's support. Clinton has fared worse with men, a little more than two-thirds of the male votes going to Obama in both Maryland and Virginia.

Feb. 18 was another primary for states with less influence, like Wisconsin, Washington and Hawaii. Most of the candidates focused on March 8, an important primary day that includes Ohio, Rhode Island, Texas and Vermont.

These next three weeks could very well determine who will be on the bill for voters in November.

Winter Weather Woes:

Enjoy the fact that no one can predict the weather

Rejoice, as it is mid-February and there is a warm light at the end of winter's cold and dreary tunnel.

It sometimes amazes me how something as uncontrollable as the weather can manipulate your overall disposition and ultimately take control of you. Every once in awhile I'll have a great day in January or February and walk outside where the harsh unforgiving winter grabs me and reminds me that I'm supposed to be depressed.

Nothing makes me long for the days of March the moment I – books in one hand, coffee in the other – realize it's going to take the strength of both my hands to unlock my frozen car door.

To me, there is something morbidly poetic about winter. It's a time of year that evokes certain emotions that are crucial to my being. Everything is relative to season for me. Winter is synonymous with the St. Louis Blues while spring correlates to the St. Louis Cardinals. Winter means Jawbreaker, Fugazi, and Joy Division while summer brings Lifetime, Bad Brains, and anything else that can be sung aloud while driving with the windows down.

There are certain things in my life that I have accepted as being constants. I will always hate waking up and mornings in general. But depending on the time of year there is an extra hassle thrown my way – it's 10 degrees out and I have the added aggravation of running through the biting cold to warm up my car. And maybe this is why I secretly or ignorantly enjoy winter – it is not constant and it gives me something to look forward to.

Dry campus creates safer college environment

By Candice VanHoosier
Contributing Writer

Even though I do not personally drink, I have always wondered if strong policies against drinking on college campuses were effective in preventing or reducing drinking.

It has to be assumed that the percentage of students at Lindenwood who drink heavily is perhaps no different than the percentage at other universities.

Research on the effects of alcohol on college students has examined the correlation between drinking and dry campuses, such as Lindenwood. The results were compelling.

A study by Wechsler found that compared with 48 percent of drinking college students on non-dry campuses, only 38 percent drink on dry campuses. Statistically speaking this number is significant.

The study also found that dry campuses have less secondhand problems on campus than non-dry campuses experience.

"Students are less likely to be insulted, injured, experience unwanted sexual advances, or be otherwise negatively affected by other students drinking," said

Wechsler.

However, further study has shown that the effects and actions of those already predisposed to drinking are unaffected by such bans.

Even though one is not drinking on campus, is it possible that students are merely going off campus to drink?

This would create another concern: drinking and driving. Many schools have implemented policies that keep students from drinking and driving.

For example, Midwestern University has worked with local bars and restaurants to create what is called the Safe Ride Program.

This program allows students to be picked up by a bus around midnight and be driven back to campus—there are ways universities can help reduce accidents, or even fatalities, related to drinking and driving.

Overall, these studies have suggested that banning policies combined with society and legal enforcement's efforts could drastically lower the amount of casualties, incidents, and alcoholics later in life.

Perhaps dry campuses are one of a series of steps that can help address problem drinkers.

Meet Jack Sago

Natural Science Club president pushes for recycling

By Zach Stergos
Contributing Writer

What's in a name? Not much, unless of course that name is Jack Sago, 22, a senior at Lindenwood University. Sago is a well known and respected student on campus, a local boy who has traveled to four continents and done things that most of us will never have the opportunity to do.

Starting at a young age, Sago had big dreams of traveling the world. In summer 2002, he got his first taste at realizing those dreams when he went to Chile and Argentina through a study abroad program.

He was able to go South America and learn the culture while being able to teach children how to better speak and understand English. This first experience was the start for Sago's wandering ways.

"Seeing all the different cultures around the world and how they all vary from each other is amazing, and I know there are more things that need to be done in other countries; our problems here in America aren't as severe as we may think," Sago said.

He returned to Chile and Argentina in summer 2004. Next he went to Mexico in summer 2005. He joined with a Methodist church group that was going to a needy part of the country to build houses for homeless families.

His biggest accomplishment so far happened over this past summer when Sago applied for a volunteer research program through Boston University. The program was going into Kenya to assist the Kenya Wild Life Service in a multitude of duties.

As president of the Natural Science Club, Jack Sago helps take care of the environment by organizing the Stream Clean event and informing students of ways to "go green."

"I wanted field experience, but I wasn't exactly sure what yet," Sago said. "I looked at different programs and found this opportunity. I was accepted with a full ride scholarship and left three weeks later."

While in Kenya, Sago lived in a glorified wood hut for the better part of two months and worked from 5 a.m. until after the sun went down. His group's job consisted of biological research on the many different animal species and how they were affected by human population growth in the Serengeti Ketingala Dispersal Area.

During January term, Sago was one of the students who attended the school-sanctioned trip across Europe. They were able to visit a multitude of countries, including Italy and Spain.

Even at home, Sago takes on many tasks. He is the president of the Natural Science Club, former vice president to his fraternity, Alpha Sigma Phi, and he's a member of the Lindenwood Student Government Association.

His adviser and mentor, Professor Marilyn Abbott, dean of sciences, said, "Jack is one of those examples of if you want something done, ask a busy person. He is even good at getting other students involved and excited about things as well."

On campus he is an advocate for the "Go Green" program and helps run the stream clean that is organized by the Natural Science Club. He would love to see the idea of recycling on campus hit it big.

Sago is a humanitarian and thinks that these types of issues affect us all and most don't realize it. One program he is passionate about is a "meals to homes program," where the leftovers from the cafeteria would be donated to less fortunate families in the area, and delivered by different school groups each week.

"Jack Sago was in everything, did everything and always bettered every organization he has ever been in," said John Miller, a Lindenwood freshman and former high school classmate.

One of the things most important in Sago's life is his fraternity, Alpha Sigma Phi. He has been an active member for four years and hails it as one of the best decisions he ever made.

Sago and other Alpha Sigs organize street clean-ups and fundraisers that help the Boys and Girls Club of St. Charles.

Sago will graduate in May after four years at Lindenwood. After he receives his undergraduate degree, he is unsure of his next step. He was recently accepted to Southern Illinois University at Edwardsville's Ph.D. program and would love to pursue his doctorate in biology. He is also considering finding a job with an environmental research company, which has always been a passion of his.

No matter where his path leads him, Sago has already accomplished things and seen places that many only dream of.

A student in Costa Rica sips a coconut drink in a Latin American city. The class visited different areas of the country during the J-term trip.

Class gets taste of Costa city life

The story is second in a series of stories about Costa Rica.

By Amanda Hayes
Staff Writer

Salsa dancing and earth tremors are a few of the cultural experiences Lindenwood students shared while spending J-term in Costa Rica.

Students spent the first half of the trip at the beach, but the second part gave the class a taste of city life in the Latin American country.

In Heredia, a city just outside the capital of San José, the group attended classes at the school Intercultura and explored the country's central valley during the afternoon.

"I was definitely more concerned with safety in Heredia than in Sámara," said sophomore Estey Masten. "It was a lot harder to get to know people."

Instead of Sámara's dirt roads with roaming chickens and cows, the city streets resounded with honking taxis and buses. It was also interesting to learn that pedestrians do not have the right of way.

"I've never been to a city so busy," said junior Sara Ohlms.

"I liked how we could have afternoon excursions," said Masten. In addition to these "excursions," students had the opportunity to learn cultural skills, such as dancing and cooking. Sometimes the host families offered to share their recipes.

"My mom taught me how to make 'gallo pinto' [the traditional rice and beans dish], and my dad took me to an open air market," Masten said.

Greek system growing on campus sparks student interest

Organizations hold rituals to high standard and 'It's an awesome way to make friends and get involved with something'

By Zach Stergos
Contributing Writer

When a person thinks of student activities at Lindenwood University, Greek life is not always the first thought that comes to mind.

But Lindenwood has a growing Greek system.

Delta Zeta was the first sorority on campus. A group of students formed the sorority in 1992 because they wanted to experience what thousands have done before them.

Now the university has six existing groups and a new fraternity on the way.

"It's an awesome way to make friends and get involved with something," said Mandy Baker, a member of Delta Zeta.

Alpha Sigma Phi and Delta Zeta are the two largest Greek organizations on campus.

Each includes more than 30 active members and initiates about 10 new members every semester.

"Our fraternity stands for more than just social events," said Rob Chisenhall, vice president of Alpha Sigma Phi.

Tradition and ritual are some of the key factors that separate fraternities from clubs.

All of the Greek organizations hold rituals to high standards and some have extensive initiation processes that can last several days.

"Our members are to exhibit five distinct characteristics: honor, purity, charity, patriotism and silence," said Matt Kesl, president of Alpha Sigma Phi.

These groups hold many off-campus events, such as the Relay for Life and Girl Scout Workshops that Sigma Alpha Iota, a female music fraternity, participates in every year.

Sigma Alpha Iota and Phi Mu Alpha, the male music fraternity, also host concerts and musicals on campus.

Delta Zeta hosts the "Big Man on Campus" pageant every year and the Alpha Sigs are in charge of LU-Palooza, one of the most anticipated events for spring.

Seniors rule their day as basketball sweeps Culver

Patrick Houlihan
Sports Editor

Senior Day for the Lindenwood men's and women's basketball teams Saturday was the last chance to see veterans of the two squads show their stuff on the home floor.

It might also have been the foreshadowing of things to come for both programs in their respective conference tournaments.

Earnie Norman and Travis Hawkins were both solid players when they came to Lindenwood and in their final home game, both provided excellent play against Culver-Stockton. They helped lead the Lions back from as much as 20 points, then held on for a 69-64 victory.

Hawkins contributed nine points and two rebounds and tremendous defense throughout the game.

Norman earned a double-double with 11 points and 13 rebounds and provided commanding leadership on both ends of the floor.

Head Coach Ryan Cherepkai has much respect for both seniors and the roles they play on the team.

"Both of them are tough kids," Cherepkai said.

"It's going to be hard to replace two kids who you know when there is a loose ball, they are going to get it because they are both physical. We're really going to miss them."

Last Thursday, Feb. 14, the Lions played even with the No. 4-ranked team in the nation for 32 of the 40 minutes, but Evangel went on a run to extend a 2-point lead to 10 in a matter of a couple of minutes. The Crusaders never let up, winning 79-65.

The Lions stand at 14-14 overall and 8-10 in conference play. They will be on the road for their final game of the regular season after clinching the HAAC conference tournament bid against Culver-Stockton Saturday. They will play at Benedictine Thursday, Feb. 21, at 7:30 p.m.

The lone senior for the Lady Lions, Leslie Allrich, finished her home career Saturday with a dominating performance on both ends of the floor.

She scored 10 points, grabbed four rebounds, garnered two steals, blocked four shots and altered many more to lead the Lady Lions to a 53-51 victory.

The win moved the team to 12-15 overall and 8-10 in conference play.

Head Coach Chanda Jackson felt proud for her lone graduating player.

"She did a phenomenal job," Jackson said.

Legacy photos by Jeremy Hicks
Earnie Norman (top) and Travis Hawkins (right) attempt jumpshots while being heavily guarded by Anthony Love (32) and Jeff Blauvelt (11) of Central Methodist University last Thursday.

"This is a time that every senior is stepping up and Leslie wants to step up and be a threat and go out riding the way she wants to ride it out."

The Lady Lions basketball program had gone from being a lock to make the HAAC conference tournament to having to fight to make their way in after a disappointing Valentine's Day loss to conference foe Evangel 65-53.

The Lady Lions were led by Crystal Castillo, who had 12 points on five of seven shooting, and also received 10 points apiece from Natalie Hooss and Cassie Williams.

The Lady Lions go on the road for their final game of the regular season with the possibility of a spot in the HAAC conference tournament being on the line at Benedictine tomorrow at 5:30 p.m.

Athletic grading policy comes up again

By Patrick Houlihan
Sports Editor

Fall semester's grading policy to remind student-athletes about their academic responsibility has returned as last week's four-week spring grade reports loom over teams and athletes.

According to Rich Gorzynski, former football coach and head of the Coaching with Character class/program, the issue first came up two semesters ago when it was found that 309 student athletes had either two D's or F's or had attended too few classes to maintain their academic standing. That number fell to 209 the next semester as coaches and others worked to improve athletes' academic standing.

Last summer, President James Evans announced a new student-athlete grading policy developed by Gorzynski, Vice President of Academic Affairs Jann Weitzel, Athletics Director John Creer and Evans. An initial policy was thought to be too strict; the current one allows athletes to improve their academic standing rather than face immediate suspension in their sport for a semester.

Last fall's implementation of the policy resulted in 74 students being suspended from competition.

"The policy I wrote was stricter," Evans said, "but the student development administrators and the provost convinced me to allow student athletes the opportunity to redeem themselves if they have poor grades at four weeks but they have been going to class and seem earnest in their desire to improve their grades. We let them participate in practice and athletic contests on a probationary basis."

The policy as of Feb. 20 says that any athlete failing two or more courses after four weeks or not attending classes or turning in assignments will be banned from athletic competition for the term. Athletes placed on academic report will be watched for the next four weeks, until midterm, where grades and attendance again will be checked. If no improvement is shown, they will off the team for the term.

Athletes can choose to appeal through the committee.

Weitzel said the policy likely would only come into play for athletes who fail to put forth effort in the classroom.

"The people it really will affect are those students who are not going to class, not turning work in, and failing. They are not being an academic person, those are the people who will be benched," Weitzel said.

"I agree with the policy now as does Dr. Evans," she said. "We found that the grade a student gets at four weeks does not necessarily represent that student's ability. The bottom line is, and all the coaches will agree, these are student-athletes, they are students first, we want to give our students the opportunity to be successful both in the classroom and on the playing field."

Gorzynski, Weitzel, Creer and Evans agree that it is unfair to student-athletes to be pulled from their team completely if they fail to adhere to the policy. They do think, however, that athletes should not be allowed to compete in games until their grades improve.

Creer said that coaches had been informed at meetings, but it might take time to be generally accepted.

"This is something new, so it's going to take a little time to work its way, but I think it's here for good and we may tweak it as we see fit," Creer said.

No mention of the academic grading policy could be found in the online student athletic questionnaire, however, which incoming recruits must complete before the recruiting process can begin.

Evans said the current policy is a good start to help maintain academic standing of athletes. "I think the coaches are happier with the modified policy because it allows them to emphasize the importance of academics at Lindenwood. . . . They can tell a potential student-athlete that if he/she slips early in the term, there is the possibility of redeeming oneself and participating that term, and that's what I like about the modification."

Tennis teams eager for new season, new success in 2008

By Lindsey Mercer
Contributing Writer

The Lindenwood University men's and women's tennis teams first match is at home Saturday, March 1, against Le Tourneau University, Texas, at 9 a.m. on the Lindenwood tennis court.

Coach Bill Vahle, LU tennis coach for three years, says he is excited about both teams competing against Benedictine, Graceland and McKendree for men's and women's teams because they are "probably the teams in the region that we will have to beat in order to make it through the conference and regional tournaments."

Katie Harris, sophomore and new LU tennis player, emphasized that she was excited about "playing in Florida during spring break" this year for a tournament.

Harris said she has been playing tennis off and on for about 10 years and is "excited about getting to play again." Another player she says who complements her well is Alison Gillies from France, who is also new to the LU tennis team.

Other additions to the teams are Nicolas Vettard from France; Diogo Claudino, returning after a semester layoff; and Deborah Kunaka, who also plays field hockey.

Vahle's goal this season, for both the men and women, is to make it to the national NAIA tournament in Mobile, Ala. "The women went last year," the coach said. "The men went three years ago."

Harris said her personal goal for this season is to improve on her doubles.

For more information, contact Vahle at (636) 949-4363 or BVahle@lindenwood.edu.

In brief

Lacrosse opens home schedule with win

The Lady Lions lacrosse team came away with a solid win last Saturday to open their home and conference schedules. 18-1 demolishing of St. Louis University. The team was lead in the scoring column by Lacey Vatland and Kandee Schroder each garnering 5 goals. Megane Vatland led the Lady Lions with five assists while Amanda Shapiro and Caitlin Erickson shared the victory in net. The Lady Lions will open a three-games-in-four days road trip Thursday. They will go against the University of Michigan, the University of Pittsburgh and the University of Maryland before traveling to Columbia for a double-header on March 2 against Truman and Mizzou.

Roller Hockey unbeaten streak rolls to 107

The Lindenwood men's roller hockey squad continued to improve on its run towards another perfect season and possibly its sixth NCRHA national championship by winning five games over the weekend. The Lions defeated St. Charles Community College 11-1, Illinois State 10-0, won by forfeit against Illinois 1-0, beat Meramac 10-0 and survived against Truman 7-2. The Lions will play UMSL on March 1 before regionals.

the individuals who lived there.

"We'll be using history to teach the other disciplines: math, physics, etc.," Manus said.

A few of the introductory classes available for late-start this semester are Casting and Angling, Hunting in Missouri, and Dutch Oven Cooking.

Courses and events are also offered to the public year-round.

For more information on the Boone Campus and classes offered, contact Professor David Knotts at 636-798-2166.

Lindenwood University acquired the Boone Home in 1998 from Randall and Alean Andrae, private landowners who donated the property. The campus has grown to 1,000 acres in the last 10 years. Photo by Chris Zammit
