SYNOPSIS.

The scene opens with Heinrich and Lisbeth arranging the table for luncheon. After much chattering, Heinrich exclaims, "God be praised the table is set", and playfully asks Lisbeth to repeat the same. She, thinking this very foolish, stubbornly refuses, and they fall into a dispute. Alfred, having overheard the quarrel, laughingly relates it to his wife, confidently assuring her that no such trifling matter could cause them to quarrel, that 'his loving wife' would repeat the words for him. Emma, who at once sides with Lisbeth, refuses and a great quarrel ensues. While in tears, her parents are announced for luncheon. The father suggests a toast, but noticing that Alfred and Emma do not respond, asks rather indiscreet questions, whereupon Alfred explains the cause of the trouble. The old gentleman gently reproves the young couple and with assurance requests his wife to repeat the words. Katharina, siding with her daughter, refuses and they quarrel.

Finally, Emma yields on being given a shawl by Alfred and Katharina unconsciously repeats the phrase in an effort to effect a reconciliation between Lisbeth and Heinrich. Lisbeth remains stubborn until in her delight over a promise regarding her marriage with Heinrich, she exclaims, "Ach! Gott sei Dank!" Being caught in repeating the first part, she reluctantly yields by finishing the expression and "Ende gut, Alles gut".
